Surficial Materials

Woodland Quadrangle, Maine

Boulders, gravels, and sand bars in the upper St. John River, Maine, with notes on the surficial deposits and their possible uses.

Local Materials/Maps

The data shown here may be used for a variety of purposes, including but not limited to: a) The St. John River system is a major source of gravel and sand for construction purposes; b) The surficial deposits in the area are predominantly glacial outwash deposits, which are ideal for construction purposes; c) The surficial deposits are also suitable for long-term storage and mining operations; d) The surficial deposits are also important for the study of the glacial history of the area.

The surficial deposits in the area are predominantly glacial outwash deposits, which are ideal for construction purposes.

The surficial deposits are also important for the study of the glacial history of the area.

The surficial deposits are also suitable for long-term storage and mining operations.

The St. John River system is a major source of gravel and sand for construction purposes.

OTHER SOURCES OF INFORMATION