HUNTING IN MAINE

HERE is no section of the United States that offers the hunter any better opportunity for a delightful hunting trip than does the State of Maine. 15,000,000 acres abound with deer, bear, and partridge, affording the hunter ample opportunity to test his skill. Hundreds of lakes and miles and miles of sea coast also afford an opportunity for wild ducks, geese, and other shore birds. The woods of Maine are easy to get to, and the accommodations are of the best, and one is sure to see plenty of game. We have never known a sportsman to come here without his having his shot at a deer, merely his skill against the wildness of our forest inhabitants.

Years ago, a hunting trip meant a lot of hardship, and a great deal of time was consumed getting in and getting out of the hunting grounds, so that little time was left for hunting. Now, thanks to the railroad facilities and good automobile roads and easily traveled trails, this is a thing of the past, and from five days to a week will give the sportsman ample opportunity to have his fill of hunting.

The hunting camps of Maine form an institution peculiar to the state alone, and are very attractive, generally a group of log cabins near the shores of some beautiful inland lake with a large general camp in addition where the sportsmen gather for meals and to talk over the events of the day. The individual cabins are warm and cozy with open fire-places, spring beds, and everything to make the hunters' stay comfortable. Men staying in the Maine woods for a week during the hunting season go back to their work better fitted both mentally and physically to take up the duties of an arduous winter ahead of them.

It is very fitting that the Maine guides be given a paragraph in this pamphlet. They are undoubtedly the best men doing this sort of work to be found in this entire country. They are incomparably superior to the so-called guides which the traveled sportsman recalls having had any dealings with in other sections of the United States. You will find him an excellent cook, splendid canoeist, keen hunter, and rigid observer of the game laws. A brief hunting trip with one of these guides, skilled by long experience in the ways of the woods, depending even for his very life on that skill, is an education in woodcraft and nature lore which no wages can adequately recompense.

The hunting region of Maine may be described as the west, northwest, north, northeast, and east section of the state, extending the entire length of the international boundary. For the benefit of those sportsmen contemplating hunting trips this fall, we are giving a brief description of each of these sections and the camps which we recommend for the sportsman to patronize.
