EXCERPTS FROM THE STATE BIOLOGIST'S 1981 ANNUAL REPORT ON SEBAGO LAKE:

"Salmon growth continues to break all records since the Fishery Division began to keep records at SEBAGO LAKE back in 1957. Salmon in 1981 averaged 24.2 inches in length and 3 pounds, 15 ounces in weight. 4-year-old salmon...averages 24.4 inches long and 5½ pounds in weight! Togue...averaging 26.4 inches in length and 7 pounds, 11 ounces in weight. The largest togue reported weighed 18 pounds, 14 ounces...many "old time fishermen"...who have fished the lake for 50 years or more...could not remember when larger salmon were taken. Even some of the old angler records...on people who "trained up" from Boston to fish SEBAGO LAKE in the early 1900s, were not any more impressive than the 1981 records. A few larger salmon were caught back in these days, but the average salmon caught was similar in size to those caught in 1981. Salmon have to weigh at least 6 pounds to qualify for the "One That Didn't Get Away Club", and...I can guess that somewhere between 50 and 60 entries were made into this club in 1981."

SEBAGO LAKE'S 28,771 acres also boasts EXCELLENT FISHING for TOGUE, SQUARETAILS, SMALLMOUTH & LARGEMOUTH BASS, WHITE PERCH, WHITEFISH, SMELT & CUSK.

SEBAGO LAKE CAMPS are just a 2½ hour drive from Boston and have available for you NON-RESIDENT LICENSES, BAIT, BOATS, MOTORS, CANOES, MOORINGS and ICE FISHING CAMPS.

Our sixteen modern, comfortable, housekeeping cottages with screened porches accommodate from two to eight persons each. Ten of these are completely winterized, as we are open year round. All are equipped with electric refrigerator, apartment gas range, flush toilet, lavatory, shower, automatic gas or wood heater, dishes, glassware, silverware, cooking utensils and toaster. We supply free of charge gas, electricity, wood, bedding, bed linens and towels. Write or phone for our free brochure.

SEBAGO LAKE CAMPS
North Sebago, Maine 04029
Dear Anglers,

The great State of Maine has long been famous for its fine fisheries resources, and for the thousands of ponds, lakes, rivers, and streams which offer excellent opportunities to "land a lunker."

If you are considering a fishing trip in Maine, or have already decided to bring your rod and reel to the Pine Tree State, it is my hope that this booklet will help you plan, and successfully complete, your Maine fishing experience. But there is at least one more folder that every fisherman should have -- the regulations book, which itemizes the special regulations on individual waters of Maine, and sets down the general laws and regulations governing angling Down East. If such a folder was not, or is not, supplied with your license, ask for it. It's a great help!

As you travel through Maine, don't hesitate to seek assistance from members of the Maine Warden Service. For everything from directions to interpretations of the law, the wardens are there to help -- and they know their business!

Again, thank you for choosing the Pine Tree State for your fishing trip, and good fishing wherever you go!

Sincerely,

FLY FISHING FOR MAINE'S LANDLOCKED SALMON

by Al Raychard

Author, "Al Raychard’s Guide to Fly Fishing in Maine" and
"Trout And Salmon Stream of New England"

Any fisherman who wants to try his luck casting a fly or trolling a streamer for landlocked salmon (Salmo-salar Sebago) should understand his best chances for success lie within the State of Maine. While other states and countries provide this species as a prized gamefish, none offers the fisherman the diversity of water habitat or as many lakes, ponds, rivers, and streams to as does Maine — the original home of the landlocked salmon in the United States.

At last count, over 250 Maine waters maintained landlocked salmon as a principal resource. Lakes and ponds from the size of Moosehead and Sebago to Swan Lake in Swanville, and rivers and streams from the size of the Crooked River to the West Branch of the Penobscot are available. Each offers something special, something unique, and provides varied angling opportunities to fishermen of all interests.

One of the most popular ways of fishing for landlocked salmon, however, is with a fly rod, whether it be on a lake or a river. The use of streamers, bucktails, wet flies, nymphs, and dry flies in moving water, and either long-shanked or tandem trolling flies on lakes, is a traditional Maine tactic innovated by our fishing ancestors before the outboard motor arrived. It is equally as popular and productive today, with many landlocked salmon waters restricted to the use of artificial lures, which includes flies or fly fishing only.

For equipment, those fishing rivers and streams will need a fly rod 8 to 8½ feet long designed for a 6- or 7-weight line, leaders with tippets ranging from one-half-pound test to two-pound test, and a host of flies in different designs. Casting streamers and bucktails such as the Gray Ghost, Black Ghost, Red and White, Supervisor, Mickey Finn, Nine-Three, and the White and Yellow Marabou in sizes 6 to 10 during periods of high water are excellent.

Unlike its close relative the Atlantic salmon, the landlocked will readily accept a wide variety of flies throughout much of the Maine open-water fishing season if they are presented and used correctly.

Stream and river fishing for landlocked salmon is usually best from mid-April through the months of May and June over much of the state, and perhaps into mid-July in a select few spots. After that, action tapers off until September when crisp nights and fall rains cool water temperatures and salmon start to prepare for their spawning run.

The Rangeley Region's lakes and ponds are usually ice-free by Mid-May and the fishing season continues through September. In spring, trophy brook trout and the fighting landlocked salmon rise to the surface to strike at the cast or trolled fly or lure. The region offers rivers and innumerable ponds and streams which support large populations of trout and salmon, some of which are fly fishing only.

Casting streamers and bucktails are best early, particularly in high water since many imitate smelt, shiners, dace, and other important forage fish which salmon readily feed on at this time of year. Wet flies, dry flies, and nymphs do well starting in late May and through June when may, caddis, and other insect flies become active and start to emerge. In September during the “fall run,” large nymphs, small attractor and bucktails, and wet flies are the general rule.

Maine has many excellent landlocked salmon rivers and streams providing something for everyone, from the novice to the expert to the fisherman, who wants to get away from the house for an afternoon or a week.

Many Maine lakes are blessed with landlocked salmon; the list is impressively long. Generally, fishing is best from ice-out in the spring to approximately the third week of June, with flies trolled off tributary mouths, along rocky shores, and points next to drop-offs. September is a productive time as well, in the same locations.

For equipment, a fly rod 8½ to 9 feet in length, a reel capable of taking a level-8 sinking weight line plus 100 yards of backing will be needed. Leaders should be made of level 8-pound test monofilament and should be no less than 30 feet long. Long-shanked, or tandem-streamer flies and bucktails, such as the Gray and Black Ghost, Red and White, Mickey Finn, Miss Sharon, Senator Muskie, Supervisor, Nine Three, Grand Laker, Red Gray Ghost, and Green Ghost are all popular flies. Troll any streamer fly at a good speed with one line always in prop wash.

If you are looking for a place to make a float trip for bass, I can’t think of a better area to recommend than Washington County in eastern Maine. The Maine Forest Service maintains authorized campsites at numerous locations on most of the major bass lakes in this picturesque northwoods territory, and you can paddle a canoe for days along undeveloped forest shores and be over-productive bass water the entire time.

I once spent a week paddling around in Washington County’s Grand Lake chain, at the height of the bass nesting season in mid-June, and never saw another bass fisherman. We did see some boats troll past in the distance, dragging flies and lures for salmon and lake trout, but we never met another shoreline caster.

For a week we moved from campsite to campsite, paddling our canoes quietly along the shorelines and discovering nesting bass on rocky bars, on gravel patches under the cover of overhanging trees, and in the shallow coves where sunken driftwood offered protection. The fishing was out of this world and we had it all to ourselves.

At night we built campfires at lakeshore campsites and fried sweet, lightly floured bass fillets in a sputtering cast-iron skillet. We went to sleep at night listening to the haunting cries of the loons.

FLY FISHING MAINE’S REMOTE TROUT PONDS

by Al Raychard

A survey conducted by the Maine Department of Inland Fisheries and Wildlife several years ago concluded that brook trout (Salvelinus fontinalis) were the most popular gamefish among residents and nonresident fishermen.

That the brook trout would be considered the number one gamefish among Maine fishermen is not surprising. It is generally accepted by the fishing fraternity that Maine contains one of the best native trout fisheries remaining in the United States, perhaps the best and most abundant, and the species is readily available. Other states may argue, but one thing is certain. Few other states offer as many waters with native strains of brook trout and few other states, if any, can boast that the brook trout is the most popular and sought-after gamefish among its resident and visiting fishermen.

Characteristically, brook trout will be found in small brooks, in streams, large rivers, lakes, and ponds which offer sufficient feed, clean water, and relative cool temperatures throughout the year. In Maine, however, the most popular havens for fishermen are secluded and remote ponds in the backcountry that offer not only productive trout fishing but a picture-postcard setting and atmosphere as well. For Maine fishermen, the western and northern counties of the state have hundreds of such waters.

Fishing a remote Maine trout pond is one of the most rewarding experiences of the angling world. On such a retreat a person can escape from the busy world and find peace and freedom. Such ponds are often frequented by moose, loons, and other animals, birds and waterfowl. There is no better place to observe wildlife in its natural state. For many, the trout fishing is simply an extra bonus.

To others, however, and I would say the majority, the fishing opportunities are the main attraction, and understandably so. To have a native brook trout rise to a dry fly or accept a sub-surface offering is a unique thrill.

Historically, the brook trout has been a principal adversary of fly fishermen. Modern anglers have found squaretails to be receptive to lures and bait. But on remote ponds the fly rod, dry fly, streamer, bucktail, and wet fly are the most popular tools of trade. As a matter of fact, the majority of better native trout ponds in western and northern Maine are indeed restricted to fly fishing only.

Brook trout will, of course, accept a wide variety of flies. In the spring, from mid-to-late May to early June when water temperatures are still cold, the big trout will be cruising close to shore and often close to the surface in search of bait fish. Patterns such as the Muddler, Hornburg, Black Nose Dace, Light and Dark Edson Tigers and Tri-Color in sizes 6 to 10 used with a sinking or sinking-tip line are good selections.

Later on, when water temperatures close to the surface start to warm, trout will cling to the spring holes; wet flies are best then. When insect life becomes active, in June and July, dry flies are best, particularly during a hatch, and in the early morning and late afternoon when a pond is flat calm.

Popular dry flies include the Adams, the Mosquito, Black Gnat, Hendrickson,

When writing advertisers, please mention “MAINE GUIDE TO FISHING.”
Light and Dark Cahill, Red Quill, March Brown, Humpy, Gold Ribbed Hare's Ear, Whirling Blue Dun, Quill Gordon, and Royal Coachman in sizes 10 down to 16.

Finding a remote trout pond in Maine with native trout is not a major problem. As a matter of fact, it is not a problem at all. A list of such waters would be quite lengthy, and so the following ponds are recommended.

In western Maine: Abbie Pond in T.4.R.6; Pond-In-The-River in Township C; Beaver Pond in Magalloway; Mountain Pond in Rangeley; Lower and Upper Black Ponds in T.4.R.5; Long Pond in Lynchtown Township; Beaver Pond in Seven Ponds Township; the Blanchard Ponds in Davis Township; and Flat Iron Pond also in Davis Township.

In the Jackman region of Somerset County, Grace Pond is one of the best. Rock and Iron ponds in T.5.R.6 are good, as are Little Enchanted Pond in Upper Enchanted Township and Baker Pond in T.5.R.6. Ellis Pond, Horseshoe Pond, and Round Pond, all in Chase Stream Township, are excellent.

Baxter State Park offers many secluded trout ponds, many requiring a hike to reach. Those in the interior such as Russell Pond, Deep Pond, Six Pond, and Long Pond provide magnificent opportunities. Newsowadnehunk Lake is not as remote as some might like, but it is one of the best native trout waters in the state.

Accessibility to Maine's remote ponds is limited. A four-wheel-drive vehicle and an updated map of the area are often a must. Fishermen may also hire the services of a float plane in several popular fishing regions such as Rangeley, Jackman, Moosehead Lake, Shin Pond, and Ashland.
