

NUMBER 23.

On June 21st took an English brig and sent her in. On June 25th had an engagement with a ship of 16 guns from 5 to 5 o'clock. P. M., when a frigate appeared in sight, the Hibernia, having three men killed and several wounded, left her antagonist and was chased by the frigate until 12 o'clock. On June 7th, the schooner and sent her to Newburyport. July 10th, in company with Capt. Leitch, of Salem, took a ship carrying 13 four-pounders, and in the same day took a brig and then a schooner laden with molasses. July 11th, took a hermaphrodite brig in ballast; and having a number of prisoners on board gave them the trig, and gave chase to another brig in sight, and took her." A good month's work this for the Irish sailor. When the war was over, and the British troops had left New York of "Evacuation Day," they cut down the cleats from the liberty pole on the Battery, and flinging it, left behind them the English flag flying from the top. The young sailor volunteered to climb the pole and haul down the British flag, and who did do it, was Patrick MacGuinness, a nephew of Captain John O'Brien!
