Ode to a Clam.
Sphinx of the fragrant sand!
Thou art the stony emblem of repose,
Terrestrial type of silence and stability
Though thou possess little versatility,
Or eke agility.

Within thy scallop cave upon the sand,
Thou standest on thy toes
And gaze through thy porthole at the grand Procession of life-stars,
And shudders at the elemental wars,
Thou tender-hearted teacher of humility!
Oh, offspring of the welled hand and sea
From worldly worry thou art free,
Born of the odorous shore,
Where bland September smiles,
And sweetening breezes blow from spicy isles,
Where summer sands are growing,
And luck and leisure the fragrant wave is flowing.

All favoring forces blend
That earth or sky can lend
To give to thee this stone-unprisoned torso,
This savory morsel!
How very thankful, then, we ought to be,
Oh, clam,
That evolution hath engendered thee—
I am.

Johnny kissed me when we met,
Jumping from the car he got in;
Mrs. Crosby—you who get Gossip in your list, put that in.
Say I'm Tomboy—say I'm mad—
Say that modesty has left me;
Say—just don't forget to add—
Johnny kissed me!

A TALE OF LEAP YEAR.

"Nothing but a private—a common private!"

It would be vain to attempt to portray the Lady Macbethian scorn which curved Harriet Deane's lip as she spoke the sentence. John Carlyle, albeit he was quite conscious of not deserving the keen-edged contempt, quailed beneath it, nevertheless.

"But, Harriet—"

"Hush!" said the imperious beauty, holding up a warning finger. "I want to understand this matter. Gilbert Armour was promoted to be second-lieutenant, was he not?"

"Yes."

"And you are his equal in all respects?"

"Yes."

"Might you not also have shared his honors?"

"I might, I suppose, Harriet," said the young soldier, fixing his calm, dark eyes upon her fair face. "If I had chosen to share them at the expense of poor Talcott, who earned his shoulder-straps long ago. They should have been his every right in months since, but poverty and obscurity are not the best place-winners. Either Gilbert Armour or I must stand aside to see a wronged man righted. He did not choose to sacrifice promotion to a scruple. I did. Harriet, was I wrong?"

"Oh, of course it is nothing to me," said Miss Deane. "You were perfectly right in consulting your own choice. Will you be good enough to hand me that work-basket?"

John Carlyle sat looking at the pretty creature, around whom the love of his strong nature had been entwined with fervor rare enough in these matter-of-fact days, in wistful perplexity. Shining auburn hair, parted away from a low, pearl-pure brow; deep blue eyes, like the velvet petals of a pansy, and a mouth whose intense crimson reminded you of the inside leaves of a Lord Raglan rose, she was by no means disagreeable to look at, and Mr. Carlyle was quite sensible of the fact.

Harriet, he said, with an unconscious tremor in the syllables, "I can see."

"Excuse me, sir," interrupted Miss Deane, with studied ceremony. "I am particularly busy counting these stitches—if you would be so obliging as not to interrupt me."

All unversed as he was in the devious windings of feminine nature, John Carlyle instinctively felt that this was no auspicious season for the furtherance of his suit.

"I'll try again to-night," he mused, walking homeward. "She won't be doing croquet work forever, and I cannot go away in such torturing suspense as this. She is vexed about the shoulder-straps; I wish, for her sake, I had them, yet I would not wear them tarnished by the faintest stain of injustice or dishonor."

The clear January sky was jeweled with frosty stars, and the solemn old church clock had just chimed nine from its dim belfry, when he entered the bright room, with its mossy blue carpet and hangings of purple silk, and Arabian statuettes hidden by vases of vivid crimson roses.

It was not, however, empty, as he had hoped and expected. Lieutenant Armour stood in the middle of the apartment, decidedly conscious of his fine new shoulder-straps, and patronizing half a dozen pretty girls. He nodded laughingly to Carlyle, and went on with the sentence which the new arrival had interrupted.

"Leap year, to be sure it is. And I may as well state at once that I'm ready to receive any propositions you ladies may have to make."

"Nonsense, Gilbert," said Mary Elphinstone, his cousin.

"Nonsense, eh? Well, I'm glad you consider it in that light—I don't. I think it's a great shame the girls don't avail themselves of their privilege, when we men are ready with our blushes and timid glances."

He looked at Harriet Deane as he spoke, half in earnest, half jestingly. John Carlyle's eye followed the direction of his, as by a sort of fascination, and saw the rose tint mounting to Harriet's cheek, and the purple blue eyes hidden by their white lids. How long he stood there, with a giddy pain surging through his brain, and a chill at his heart, as if a cold hand was grasping at his fibers, he did not know; it might have been five minutes, or it might have been five hours; but he was roused by the breaking up of the little party, the sound of merry voices and playful adieux.

Harriet Deane was standing under a handkerchief, one white hand resting on the carved back of a gothic chair. Gilbert Armour lounging on a sofa, where the blue silk curtains swept over the entrance to a bay window. As John Carlyle pressed forward, Miss Elphinstone laid her hand on his arm softly.

"No—no," she whispered, archly, "don't you see it's an understood matter with Gilbert and Harriet? Give me your arm home, for Gilbert will never think of me again."

John Carlyle turned silently away with white and clenched teeth, blind to the glances that shone through Harriet's lashes, the uncertain quiver of her lips.

But to his horror and surprise she burst into a storm of passionate tears, through which her violent eyes flashed with ominous sparkles.

"Don't speak to me!" she sobbed; "don't come near me, Gilbert Armour! I wish you'd go home, and never come near me again."

"Harriet!"

"How dare you call me Harriet, Lieutenant Armour? Not another word; I don't want to hear what you are going to say."

She held open the door, imperially dignified, although the tears hung on her lashes, and the auburn braids, escaping from their pins, swept her shoulders, and Lieutenant Armour walked out crestfallen.

"Well, I've got my dismissal," quoth he to himself, biting his long mustache in impatient wrath. "But who would ever have thought she was such a confounded little vixen?"

"You might take off the upper arm just here, without—"

"What's the use? He won't last out the day any way, and we might as well let him go easily, ever if we had time to waste in unnecessary operations."

"I'm not so certain about that. Give me the man's chance for his life. Where's the other?"

"You want no other; he is totally insensible."

The words fell like meaningless jangles of sound on John Carlyle's ear as he lay, one in a multitude of dying men, in a weather-beaten old shed. The busy doctor and the kind-hearted young cadet made no impression on his fading mind; he heard what they said as if they had been talking of someone else. There was no volition, no intellect. Life seemed ebbing away from him as the sparkling tide goes creeping, creeping from under the stranded boat.

All at once there came a sudden, sharp pain, as the surgeon's keen instrument cleft the arm, and then followed insensibility.

"Ten to one he will die," said the surgeon, indifferently, as he replaced the clattering tools. "There's no use of bandaging it so carefully." But the young cadet knelt down to fasten the wrappings, wondering in his secret heart if the time would ever come when he, too, should speak so carelessly of a fellow-creature's life, God-given.

John Carlyle did not die, the grim old surgeon to the contrary notwithstanding.

There had been a glorious thunder-shower. Along the west lung heavy draperies of violet-black clouds, edged with dazzling fringes of gold, while the blue zenith, smiling through its brief tears, seemed literally to swim in liquid light.

And from far-off apple orchards, pink with billows of tossing blossom, and sunny slopes all enurpled with wild violets, came sudden sweeps of fragrance on the city winds, carrying the Wall street jobbers and shrewd money-makers back to the time when they were boys, looking for the first strawberry blossom under the rosy canopy of the apple trees.

The fresh breeze, eddying into the wide open hotel windows, lifted the damp masses of hair on John Carlyle's wasted forehead, as he sat in the easy chair beside the easement, and passed his cool fingers softly over his burning temples, as if it fain would whisper:

"Don't repine any longer! Look out on the glad blue sky, and feel heaven's healing sunshine on your cheeks."

As if man ever heeded nature's silent admonitions! John Carlyle was no exception to the general rule.

"A common private! Those were her very words," he murmured to himself, with a faint crimson spot burning on his cheek—"and crippled poor for life! Ah, it was well that I drew back into the shadow of the curtains when I heard her step in the corridor. Why did they bring me here, of all places in the world? Must I drink the bitter cup of humiliation to the very dregs? They should have let me die that dismal night in the hospital when the ligature slipped off and the red life-stream drained slowly from the vital sources—that night when fever throbbled in all my veins, and I madly fancied I could feel her tears dropping on my cheek. If I had died—never waking from the delusion! But now a common private with only one arm!"

He laughed bitterly at the perpetually recurring conviction pressed itself upon his mind—a laugh that was almost a sob. Only twenty-six, and weary of his life; it is not often that heart and hope die out of a man's breast at twenty-six.

And the clustering domes and spires of the great city, leaning against the sunset, grew dim, and seemed to reel, as he looked upon them, through the mist that was more bitter than rivers of salt tears.

"John!"

He turned listlessly around, fancying that the word had roused itself somehow out of the vague imaginings and unspoken fantasies that were whirling in his brain.

But it was not fancy.

A slender little figure in a deep pink—the very dress he had been used to admire long ago—was kneeling on the carpet beside him, and Harriet Deane's auburn hair, gleaming golden in the sunset, fell over the arm of his chair where the fair head dropped.

"Harriet! Not there, dearest—not there. Let me raise you."

"Oh, let me kneel here, John!" she sobbed, "let me hide my face until I have told you all. If I could but call back those dreary days when I was so heartless, so cruel toward you; and you have undergone so much since! But indeed I loved you all the time, John, even when I was most wilful; and I love you still! And oh! if you will only let me be your little wife, I will nurse you so tenderly and care for you so fondly! Don't send me away from you now, John, or I shall die!"

The sweet, pleading face, with its velvet blue eyes shining through tears, and quivering scarlet mouth—what a new loveliness it had won to John Carlyle's glad vision!

"Harriet," he said, softly, "would you sacrifice your bright, young life to a common private with only one arm?"

"I would devote it to the noblest hero who ever spilled his blood for his country."

His forehead fell on her shoulder; he was sick and dizzy with the flood tide of happiness.

"Harriet," said he, after a minute's pause, "do you know that I trusted you liked Gilbert Armour?"

The superb scorn on her arch smile was very comical, and not unpleasant to behold.

"Gilbert Armour, indeed! You are worth ten thousand Gilbert Armours!"

"Even including his shoulder-straps?"

She put her hand softly over his lips. "You must not suppose, sir," she said, with a pretty defiance which became her no less than the fearful humiliation of a minute before, "that I should have come here courting you, if you hadn't been so sick, and worn, and ill—"

"Well?"

"If it hadn't been leap year?"

The Eccentric King of Bavaria.

The loyalty of the peasants of South Bavaria is quite touching in its simplicity and faith. The present king, Ludwig, can scarcely be said to be very popular in the capital, or among the upper classes in the country. He is a man of many peculiarities, some of which may be said to almost verge on mania. Young, handsome and accomplished, gifted with rare intellect, and devoted to art and study, he has, unfortunately, permitted himself to indulge in a morbid love of solitude and distaste for society, most prejudicial to himself and to his country. Every year of his life this morbid desire of seclusion appears to increase upon him, until at the present moment it has reached a pitch which scarcely seems to admit of reason.

The king holds no court, and entertains no one. He scarcely ever visits the capital, and then only for a day or two at a time for matters of urgent business. He has a number of castles all over the country, one more retired than the other, and in these he passes his time. They are mostly known by the name of hunting lodges or shooting boxes. But the king, unlike his father, Maximilian, neither hunts nor shoots. His whole time is passed in solitary study, or in the diligent pursuit of music and painting, to both of which arts he is devoted. He seldom stays more than a week in any one place, and when he moves, does so in the depth of the night.

If in some quiet Bavarian village the night echoes are aroused by a rapid rolling of carriage wheels and the quick tramp of horses' feet, you may know it is the king changing quarters from one lonely place to another; or, perhaps, he is occasionally known to do, indulging in the pleasure of a solitary midnight drive. He admits none to his private life but artists and musicians, and of these he is a most liberal patron. But it is whispered in Munich gossip that the king proved absolutely too musical for Herr Richard Wagner himself, and that when, some years ago now, he lavished the composer to stay with him for the mutual enjoyment of their beloved art, the maestro was after a while compelled to retire, on the ground that he could not play "all day and all night, too."

The origin of all these peculiarities is sought in the fact that his father showed a great dislike to King Ludwig as a child, and so saddened his spirit; but, they are in truth hereditary, and are shared by other members of his family. To his mother the king is said to be much attached; but, though often occupying the same house, it is believed that mother and son but seldom meet.

Laughing Off a Duel.

"Sacrificing the Cash-Shannon duel," said the exchange fiend, putting his feet in the waste basket, "we need a few men like Judge Dooley. He laughed out of duels with an audacious wit that compelled even the admiration of his enemies. You remember, he said, when they threatened that if he didn't fight his name would fill the columns of a newspaper, that he had rather fill ten newspapers than one coffin. Once he went on the field with a man who had St. Vitus' dance. His opponent was standing at his post, his whole frame jerking nervously from his malady. Dooley, in the soberest manner, left his post and cutting a forked stick stuck it in the ground in front of his opponent.

"What does this mean?" asked his opponent.

"Why," says Dooley, "I want you to rest your pistol in that fork, so that you can steady your aim. If you shoot at me with that hand shaking so, you'll pepper me full of holes at the first fire!"

"Then there was a laugh all around and the duel was put off without a day."

Human Action Under Excitement.

As a ferryboat from New York was entering the slip in Jersey City, a man fell or leaped overboard. He narrowly escaped being crushed between the boat and the bridge, and in less than a second was hidden from the sight of the people who rushed to the edge of the bridge and those who were on the boat. The dockhands shouted to the pilot, and then the passengers and people on the bridge caught up the cry, and the pilot signaled to the engineer. The boat was backed and the man was revealed, struggling in the water, beneath whose surface he once disappeared for a moment. The bridge hands acted quickly and with judgment tempered by the circumstances. One dangled a short hawser over the head of the struggling man, another poked at him with a pole, and a third ran for a ladder, which he afterward placed in the pit of the man's stomach, while the man hung on to the rope. In the meantime the behavior of the spectators became exceedingly interesting. The men made no effort toward rendering assistance, but pushed and almost fought for places in the foremost ranks on the boat and bridge. The women behaved most strangely. Half a dozen of them spent several minutes shouldering their way past all the men, peering over the edge of the bridge and then forcing their way through again until they were beyond the hindmost line of people. Once there, they turned and made their way to the front again, all the time uttering sounds and exclamations of sympathy or lamentation. This they did over and over again. Others became impressed with the idea that their male companions were bent on leaping into the water after the struggling man.

"Don't, John, please. I pray you, don't, John," a pretty girl cried, as she flung her arms around the neck of a stolid-looking young man who had made no other motion than to peer between two heads in front of his. He disengaged her arms, and the girl redoubled her commands to him not to jump, not to go after the man, not to be drowned himself, and finally not to be "a fool." At the same time half a dozen feet away another young woman was clinging to the arm of her companion and sobbing loudly.

"You won't take your coat off, will you? You won't, will you?" Probably the tears in her eyes prevented her seeing, as the others did, that he would not. It was evident that nothing was likely to tempt him to.

The man in the water seized the rope and lifted his neck and shoulders above the water's surface. Then it was that one of the bridge-tenders poked him with the pole and the other lunged at him with the ladder. A colored man who stood on the deck of the ferryboat, and who was terribly excited by the scene around him, perceived a large, round, brown paper bundle lying at his feet. It had been dropped by the man in the water. The colored man seized the bundle and brandished it over his head.

"He-he! he-he!" he shouted to the man in the water, "you lost your bundle. He-he! you bundle."

He hung the parcel at the man just as the bridgemen were drawing his dripping figure up by means of the rope, the ladder and the pole. The bundle floated away and was overlooked.

An Unpleasant Predicament.

A Rochester lady who went to Avon Springs with a picnic party found herself in an unpleasant predicament. The party were enjoying themselves sipping the waters, when a friend of the lady discovered a remarkable change coming over the features of her companion. Her face began to assume a mottled appearance, black and white. She was asked if she was sick and replied in the negative, but her face became so discolored that her friends insisted on sending for a physician, who, on examining his patient, smiled and asked her what kind of paint she used. The lady partly replied that she did not paint but only used a powder. The physician attributed the discoloration to the powder, and it is supposed that it contained some chemical that changed color on contact with the sulphurous vapor of the spring.

An Old Man's Long Fast.

The Philadelphia Times gives a long account of a Frankford farmer who lived from December 13, 1870, to March 8, 1871, eighty-four days, without taking solid food. This man was about eighty years old and in very comfortable circumstances. Being troubled with biliousness and dyspepsia, which confined him to his bed, he refused to take any food except a spoonful of brandy and a like quantity of gum arabic daily. The cause of the old man's abstinence was attributed to old age and his eccentricity. His appearance did not materially change during the fast except that he lost much flesh. March 8, 1871, he began to eat solid food with apparent relish, and for four years after continued to live in the enjoyment of good health. This instance is verified by eye-witnesses, and appears as one of the most remarkable feats on record.

The First Duel in the United States.

The first duel in the United States was fought at Plymouth, Massachusetts, on the eighteenth of June, 1621, between Edward Doty and Edward Leicester, two servants, both of whom were wounded. For this outrage they were sentenced to the punishment of having their heads and feet tied together, and of lying thus twenty-four hours without food or drink. After suffering, however, in that posture an hour, at their masters' intercession and their humble request, with the promise of amendment, they were released by the governor.—Portland (Me.) Press.

THE STATE ELECTION.

It is a surprise alike to Republicans and fusionists, that the vote in Maine should have been so close, and that the result should have so long remained uncertain. Those best able to calculate on results before election, gave the State to the Republicans by several thousand majority. Men familiar with political contests came into Maine, looked over the field and declared that Republican success was assured. And yet the morning after election it was conceded that Harris M. Plaisted had been elected Governor by a large plurality. This fusion claim and Republican concession were based on the returns which had been received and upon an estimate of towns to hear from as compared with last year's vote. The returns received were from cities and large towns, accessible by rail and telegraph. These places showed large fusion gains, and the towns to be heard from were largely fusion strong-holds—so all hope was abandoned. But, as returns began to come in from these back towns, the Republicans began to take courage, for they showed general gains for our party. This Republican gain in the rural districts was as marked as the fusion gains had been in larger places. For instance, in eight western fusion towns of Oxford County, the Republicans gained about a hundred votes. Owing to this state of affairs, the result was in doubt for several days. The latest advices, however, assure us that Daniel F. Davis has been re-elected by about 200 plurality. The Republicans have made a gain of several Senators, and have a large majority in the House, and thus have complete control of the State government.

While the actual result is not so bad as the first reports indicated, there is but little in it to encourage the friend of republican institutions. The State of Maine had just been saved from a revolutionary government which Governor Garcelon had attempted to establish on an overturned ballot box. The question of denouncing this fraud was made the issue. It should have resulted in a positive and unmistakable defeat to the fusion party. Instead of that, the cities laughingly pronounce it a smart trick while the country seriously denounces it.

When things looked bleakest, Senator Blaine telegraphed that $75,000 sent into the State, had captured 3,000 votes, and pointed to the result in cities to prove his claim. We do not see as that helps the case at all. There is not much choice between a community which will sell its vote, and one whose sense of honor is so dull that it will not indignantly denounce fraud attempted against the ballot. You cannot long maintain a republic when either one of such classes holds the balance of power. Now when the Republicans are declared to have a majority of votes, our opponents charge that we are not declaring the true result. This charge comes with mighty poor grace from a party which last year tried to overturn a result declared just as this result has been declared. Charges of fraud and counter charges do prove one thing—that the political atmosphere is not so pure as it should be. We need a thorough awakening and conversion to the path of political honesty.

COUNTY ELECTION.

We gave the full vote of this county in our supplement, issued last Thursday, but as many of our subscribers have sent their supplements to friends, and are calling for more, (which we are unable to supply) we republish, in this issue, our tables of votes with editorial summary of the result.

The Republicans have carried the County for Governor Davis by 95 plurality, against a fusion majority of 340 on Governor last year, making a net gain of 436. We have gained one Representative to the Legislature, two Senators, and have elected the entire Republican county ticket by majorities ranging from 60 to 150.

Mr. Frye has 222 more votes than his competitor, F. M. Fogg, and thus leads off with the largest majority in the county.

Our Senators come next, Bisbee leading Child by 164, and Walker leading Smith by 162 votes.

Next comes H. C. Davis, for Register of Probate, with 101 majority over Hall, followed by Pettengill for Commissioner, with 86 over Hastings.

Watkins for Treasurer, with 72 over Royal, and Douglas for Sheriff, with 61 over Holbrook.

The prohibition vote was very small not even reaching the magnitude of the independent hard money Democratic party.

There are so many towns that have made magnificent gains, that we have not time to give them special mention, but present the following table, which shows the vote for Governor in 1879 and in 1880, from which comparisons may be made.

ELECTION NOTES.

—Tabulator Brown is upset.

—It looks as if Barnum didn't buy quite enough after all.

—Joy, the prohibition party candidate for Governor, received 7 votes out of 1243 votes cast in his own town of Ellsworth.

—As goes Maine so goes the Union—exceedingly close, with the chances in favor of the Republicans.—Portland Advertiser.

—The fusion victory in Maine turns out a good deal like Dickens' Marchioness's leonade—they have to make believe very hard to call it any sort of a victory at all.

—False tabulations and soft money in Maine; false counting and repudiation in the South. The democratic party is solid at both ends, and solid for everything that is bad.—Tribune.

—Wilder W. Perry, greenback candidate for Senator from Knox county, has gone up Salt River. The republican candidate, D. H. Mortland, Esq., of Rockland, is elected.—Belfast Journal.

—There is one thing that Governor Plaisted cannot do. He cannot, without the consent of the Council, increase the Democratic vote by pardoning the convicts in the State Prison.—Bangor.

—"This isn't a Maine election," said a prominent fusionist last Monday. "This is a New York election." He meant that Samny Tilden had knocked in the head of that bar! And it proved to be so.—Belfast Journal.

—The republican party stands for an honest government and an honest count. The democratic party stands for dishonest government and a false count. Witness Maine, witness Alabama, witness Arkansas, witness a solid, repudiating South.—Tribune.

—Tabulator Fogg's burial seems irreversible, although he turns in his political coffin long enough to be profane over the ill-fortune that prevented him from tabulating the vote in the Second District.—Lewiston Journal.

—The New York Evening Post says of the Maine election: "Though the vote is close the political division of the State is not substantially different from what it was last year. The subject is full of menace to the public."

—Olive Logan became converted to the Darwinian theory by observing two very intelligent monkeys in the Zoological Gardens of London. If Olive could see some of the men who voted the Fusion ticket Monday, she would have her convictions strengthened.—Simpson.

—The democrats of Boston caused a salute of one hundred guns to be fired on the back bay lands Tuesday night, to celebrate the results of the Maine election, and the Lynn democrats did likewise on Central Square, and afterwards listened to speeches in the Central Hancock club room.

—With the reverse in Maine confronting them, republicans will renew the fight along the whole line with redoubled energy. It means a stubborn battle. It means hard work. It means that the business men of the land must wake up to the risks of democratic success, with all its uncertainties and dangers.—Philadelphia Press.

—A Biddleford letter says: I am informed, from a trustworthy source, that in this city of 2100 voters, the democrats had, Monday morning, in cash, $3000, and that they offered early in the day, as high as $25 for a vote. Since that time, the democrats have been wading up to their necks in the mud of the land must wake up to the risks of democratic success, with all its uncertainties and dangers.—Philadelphia Press.

—The prohibition movement, which caused such an uproar before election, amounts to almost nothing so far as concerns the vote for Governor. The towns returned give less than a hundred scattered votes additional to those of last year. In this Congressional district, however, it came near defeating the Republicans. A change of 60 votes to Mr. Stone would have elected General Anderson.—Advertiser.

—The Boston Herald never minces matters. Speaking of the report of a corrupt use of money in the Maine election it says: It might, perhaps, be expected that a community whose moral sense and political sensibilities are so dull as to be so easily deceived as to receive an impression from the gross fraud introduced in the State last year would have no very nice scruples as to the means employed to carry an election. But when it comes to a wholesale rivalry on both sides to see which can buy the most votes in an open market, and the city franchise is freely made an object of barter and sale, it must be confessed that things have come to an alarming pass.

—Hon. Washington Long, formerly Collector at Eastport, an uncle to our Governor, was one of those Fusionists who, last winter, with his associates had to hold a session on the sidewalk in front of the State House, with a gatling gun pointed at them. His constituents have determined to send him back to take his proper seat and help bury the dead and wounded found in the lines of the aggressors.—Boston Post.

—"The uncle of our Governor" has been elected to stay at home; that's the kind of an election he has had—and that stalwart, loyal Republican, Hon. L. R. King of Caribou, has been elected to the next Legislature, instead of Long, the member of the sidewalk legislature.—Bangor Whig.

—Ex-Gov. Jewell says of the Maine election: "It is a republican reverse, it is not a democratic victory. We have been aware for a number of weeks that the state was overrun with money to be used against us. In more than one letter Senator Blaine has informed us to that effect. I think this result in Maine will help us, because it will bring the business men of the country to contemplate the possibilities of the future more closely and earnestly, and will add greatly to their activity. I think the use of money by the coalition was largely in the cities; that is shown by the increase in their votes. One of the young Irish orators whom I sent to Maine, Captain Patrick O'Farrell of Connecticut, who spent much time in the country districts, wrote me several letters, warning me not to count too sure on Maine."

—Among the subjects for congratulation on the result of this political contest is the election of Geo. D. Bisbee, Esq., to the State Senate. All the fusion papers made this a point of special advice to the voters of Oxford County—that they should defeat Mr. Bisbee. As clerk of the Hale Committee he has unearthed many of their rascally tricks and frauds, and had thus elicited their animosity. On the stump his familiarity with the attempted snail made him a prominent and most successful speaker, while his debate with F. M. Fogg placed the distinguished tabulator in the position of a dodger and false defender of his official conduct. With all this to excite them, his opponents were untiring in their efforts to defeat him, yet we are glad to see that he is triumphantly elected and vindicated from the charges of fusionists. He comes in with a larger majority than any other candidate on our County ticket.

—The fusionists evidently do not believe there is virtue enough in the State to condemn fraud, so they charge we are altering the returns. Remember 1879 and bluish.

CONGRESSMAN FRYE.

We have to congratulate the respectable people of this Congressional District on the re-election of Hon Wm. P. Frye as their representative to Congress. For ten years Mr. Frye has ably represented this District. We have patterned wisely after older States in returning Mr. Frye after term after term to his seat in Congress. By his long service, he has been enabled to make himself familiar with Congressional duties, and become acquainted with prominent men from all parts of the country. With this advantage added to his natural ability and integrity of character, he has become one of the most prominent characters in National politics today. He is undoubtedly the leader of Republican forces in Congress today and will continue to be until he is called to a higher position in the National Councils.

Mr. Frye is not only a national character, but he is a man of the people, beloved and respected at home. In Oxford County he carried 23 more votes at this election than were given for Gov. Davis, while he led his competitor by 222 votes. We do not propose to draw any comparison between Mr. Frye and his competitor, F. M. Fogg, for they should not be mentioned in the same breath but for the positions in which they are placed by political parties, and as they thus become the representatives of these parties. It would indeed have been a sad blow to this community, if the party which placed a man like Fogg in competition with Mr. Frye, should have triumphed. The District has shown that it respects itself and maintains a political integrity which seems to have been lost in some sections of the State.

The following complimentary notice of our candidate, cut from the Ellsworth American, shows how his election is regarded in another section of the State:

One of the most gratifying things in the result is the great triumph of Hon. Wm. P. Frye in the 2d District. He beats Tabulator Fogg all to pieces, and his district has the proud satisfaction of electing one of the foremost men in the country by an overwhelming majority, over a man who has been his best in the last three years to make politics in Maine despicable.

Frye opened the campaign this year in Hancock county, and set the ball a-rolling which has never stopped from that day. Ellsworth recalls with pleasure and profit Mr. Frye's speech at our County convention.

—Boston celebrated its 250th anniversary last Friday, with a procession, orations, decorations, illuminations and a general good time. The city was literally crammed with people who had come in to help the thing along.

—The Lewiston Journal usually so brilliant, failed to sustain its reputation in describing our supplement of last week. It should know that Jackals, not foxes, open graves and remove corpses. If our illustration looked like a fox it might have extended printers license to us on the ground that it was as near the real thing as the resources of our office would allow.

—F. Q. Elliott of Norway village, has just opened his fall stock of clothing, consisting of hats, caps, suits, parts suits and overcoats. His stock is good, both in materials and in make. His prices are low for cash, and he has more goods for you to select from than you can find at any other store in this vicinity.

—The town of Paris cast only 92 votes more than Norway, last Monday.—Norway Advertiser.

Norway is gaining so rapidly in population and wealth that it will wake up some fine morning and find itself the largest and wealthiest town in the County unless Paris exhibits a little more enterprise.

True Men Clasp Hands
Over the Result.

Gain of a Representative.

We present to our readers, in this,
our last political supplement, full returns from every town in Oxford County. The result, which is vividly portrayed in the above head lines and illustrations, exceeds our most sanguine expectations.

The Republicans have carried the County for Governor Davis by 95 plurality, against a fusion majority of 340 on Governor last year, making a net gain of 435. We have gained one Representative to the Legislature, two Senators, and have elected the entire Republican county ticket by majorities ranging from 60 to 150.

Mr. Frys has 222 more votes than his competitor, F. M. Fogg, and thus leads off with the largest majority in the county.

Our Senators come next, Bisbee leading Child by 164, and Walker leading Smith by 162 votes.

Next comes H. C. Davis for Register of Probate, with 101 majority over Hall, followed by Pettengill for Commissioner, with 86 over Hastings, Watkins for Treasurer, with 72 over Royal, and Douglass for Sheriff, with 61 over Holbrook.

The prohibition vote was very small not even reaching the magnitude of the independent hard money Democratic party.

There are so many towns that have made magnificent gains, that we have not time to give them special mention, but present the following table, which shows the vote for Governor in 1879 and in 1880, from which comparisons may be made.

We also present the tabulated vote for Congressman and County officers, and the complete vote of each town as cast for all candidates.

In regard to the State election, we are able to give but little definite information. Tuesday morning it was reported that the fusionists had carried everything. Tuesday night, when returns from back towns came in, the aspect changed considerably, and it has been growing brighter ever since.

Wednesday night, it is evident that our present Congressional delegation will remain unchanged, although Reed is returned by only a few over a hundred votes. Boutelle and Milliken are defeated. Plaided probably has a small plurality (less than 500) over Davis, but the 150 towns to be heard from may possibly overcome this. The Republicans have a majority in both branches of the Legislature, and will elect Davis if the Amendment is defeated, as seems likely, for the fusionists voted solidly against it. Next Monday we shall hope to announce that defeat has not actually taken the place of our expected victory.
